Sources claim that the swinging scene is rife with experimentation of drugs and sexual openness - with high-profile tech moguls being treated like 'rock stars'. One insider told The New York Post that the lifestyle is not 'uncommon' among a certain sector of tech executives in the San Francisco Bay area. Murdered CashApp founder Bob Lee was allegedly a regular at the parties, along with glamorous sister of his suspected killer. Khazar Elyassnia, 37, who was with Lee the day he died, has so far refused to be interviewed by investigators after they charged her brother Nima Momeni with the murder. She is married to plastic surgeon Dr Dino Elyassnia but was allegedly having a sexual relationship with Lee - with prosecutors claiming Momeni killed Lee after quizzing him over the suspected fling. According to inside sources Lee is not the only high-profile tech tycoon to attend the parties, claiming that they were held in a 'typical warehouse.'

She is married to plastic surgeon Dr Dino Elyassnia but was allegedly having a sexual relationship with Lee – with prosecutors claiming Momeni killed Lee after quizzing him over the suspected fling.

According to inside sources, Lee is not the only high-profile tech tycoon to attend the parties, claiming that they were held in a 'typical warehouse.'

They told the Post: 'On an upper level was a play space with mattresses inside and towels outside.

'It was like going to a tech party, except that everyone took off their clothes and went upstairs for sex.

'There is a viewpoint that the geeks who had turned into millionaires now have something open to them [opportunities for sex and drugs] in a way that it had not been before.

'A lot of these folks were nerds. When there is money and access and power, it all goes together.'

Some of the parties are invite-only, which happen behind closed doors at lavish mansions and chateaus.

Author Emily Chang reveals how the sex party usually get into full swing, starting with a cuddle puddle.

She explains in her book Brotopia: Breaking Up the Boys' Club of Silicon Valley, that groups of people lay close to each other often after taking drugs.

They then break up into smaller groups to smaller, private rooms, according to her book, which results in some of the elite 'bragging' about their personal and private lives.

One of the most selective parties in the tech field is known as the Bronze Party, with rules for the voyeurs watching the activities to whisper or 'not talk at all'.

Parties are often themed, and boast that they are the 'sexiest holiday event in the Bay Area' with DJ's.

They advise that attendees wear 'seductive lingerie and clubwear' while another suggested 'erotic glamour'.

Exclusive Bronze Party was set up by Ben Fuller, who was once a tech entrepreneur – selling his company for 'less than $5million'.

Drugs are not allowed in Power Exchange, though Powers did confirm that some attendees will only attend if they are 'drug oriented'

But others happen in the open, allowing many of the millionaires to explore new fetishes and experiences.

One San Francisco fetish club hosts parties for 'picky techies' who have specific expectations that need to be met before attending.

Josh Powers, who runs a club called Power Exchange, told the Post: 'There is a public exhibition side of it.

'Attendees may go there with another person and have other people watch them. There is a correlation between our true players and tech pushing out the culture in San Francisco.

'We attract people from the tech world. Many of them will have you submit pictures showing what you look like and who you are. Some are status-based, aimed at high-level individuals.'

Nima Momeni (left) vowed to 'came down way hard' on Lee hours before the stabbing. Prosecutors say it was a planned attack in which he used a kitchen knife to stab Lee in the heart

He added: 'Some of them feel that they need it and that things won't happen if people are not on drugs.'

It is claimed that some of the attendees go with a 'mathematical approach', even applying a 'data-driven approach to sexual relationships.'

One insider claims that engineers look 'at the number of relationships that fail and wonder how they can be optimized' — including by having multiple sexual partners.

They added: 'That approach is unique to Silicon Valley: If something fails X amount of times, let's optimize it by doing Y.'

'There is an element of people applying a data-driven approach to sexual relationships. It's not like they are partying continually.'

'They microdose with mushrooms and ketamine and go on ayahuasca retreats. It's an intellectual approach to hard partying.'

'It's normal in Silicon Valley to experiment with drugs and sex. Going to sex parties is one of the things they do'.

Those who attend the parties say there is 'no shame in doing drugs' in that world, adding that Silicon Valley is 'less judgy than New York'.

They added to the Post: 'It makes sense because people think outside the box there.

'They're still inventing the future. These people have a propensity for risk. Burning Man is part of the culture.

'You could be walking around naked, and run into a coworker who is naked and it would not be a big deal. A lot of people who do well in Silicon Valley experiment with all kinds of things.'

Another author opened up the world of secret sex parties, writing that one organizer bragged of having a key member of the iPhone development team in attendance.

Laurie Seagall wrote in her book Special Characters: My Adventures with Tech's Titans and Misfits that one man 'who created our check-in software basically built Oracle.'

The insider also claims that sex parties also take place in smaller homes, with one even having porn in 'monitors on the hallway.'

Speaking to the Post they said: 'It was not a billionaire's mansion. It was a mediocre home. It felt a little gross, kind of sketch. It was totally women and men from Silicon Valley.'
